Abstract – This technical report makes available an RFID proximity card data set. The data set is a record of the activity of proximity cards within a proximity card system that controls user access to parts of a building. It therefore characterizes the behaviour of the users of those cards. This data set would be useful in analysing the behaviour of users within this RFID system.

I. INTRODUCTION

In this technical report we make available a Radio Frequency Identification (RFID) proximity card data set (Appendix 1). The data was collected over several years from the proximity card system which is used by the School of Computing and Information Systems at the University of Tasmania, Launceston campus, to control user access to parts of its building. A proximity card is used by a user to unlock a doorway into a part of the building. The data set is a record of when users have attempted to gain access to a doorway using a proximity card. The data therefore characterizes the behaviour of users of proximity cards within this system.

II. PREVIOUS WORK

This proximity card data set has been used in [1, 2] to investigate the feasibility of anomaly based intrusion detection in RFID systems. The research investigated whether it is possible to determine when a proximity card was being used by an authorized user or an attacker. As an RFID tag is a surrogate for an entity, the researchers operated under the assumption that a change in tag ownership, when an attacker obtains an authorized users tag, could be detected by analysing a user's proximity card data records.

III. PROXIMITY CARD SYSTEM

The proximity system from which this data was collected has three components: proximity cards, readers, and a database. Each user is assigned a proximity card that contains a unique serial number. A card is a passive HID© 125 Khz RFID transponder with an effective read range of less than six inches. To unlock a doorway, a user must present their proximity card at the reader mounted next to the doorway. The reader obtains the unique serial number stored on the tag and sends it to the system's database. The database contains a record of each user, their proximity card serial number, and an authorization level that specifies which parts of the building the user may access. A doorway is unlocked when an authorized proximity card is within range of that doorway's reader. The activity of attempting to gain access to a doorway with a proximity card is recorded by the database. It is this activity, in the form of a data set, which is presented in this technical report (Appendix 1).

Figure 1 shows the layout of rooms within the building that houses the proximity card system, and the position of each proximity card reader. Reader #25 controls access to honours and research laboratories used by students. Reader #26 controls access to the main student entrance of the building. Reader #27 controls access to the corridor which leads to academic staff offices. Finally, reader #28 controls access to the administration area. In effect, the data set is a record of when a reader has read a proximity card, and therefore, a user's data records are a history of where and when that user moved through the building.

The authorization level of a proximity card, and hence a user, determines which doorways can be unlocked. In Figure 1, by default, all users may access the doorway protected by #26. Honours and research students additionally have access through doorways protected by #25 and #27, and academic staff may access doorways protected by all four readers. Although we do not include information about which user groups each user belongs to, it may be possible to determine the group a user belongs to by considering the number of records a tag has generated at each reader.

IV. DATA SET DESCRIPTION

The data set (Appendix 1) is made up of thousands of individual proximity card data records. Each record represents a single event; the outcome of when a user presented a proximity card at a reader. The reader generates one data record each time it attempts to read a proximity card. A data record is a space-separated set of attributes and corresponding data values. For example: 29/06/2006 5:44:02 PM granted 27 110. This data record specifies that tag number 110 was granted access to doorway controlled by reader 27 on date 29/06/2006 at time 5:44:02 PM. The individual fields of a data record are described in Table 1.

Table 1 - Data record attributes and possible values

Field name	Possible values	Example
Date		29/06/2006
Time		5:44:02
Time period	AM, PM	PM
Access	-Granted (access was allowed) -Denied-nopermission (access denied to this door for this user in general) -Denied-foreigncard (access denied for this door, as the card isn't one of ours) -Denied-timezone (access denied to this door for this user at this time)	granted
Reader number	25, 26, 27, 28	27
Card number	Start at 100	110

The data set has been sanitized to protect the privacy of the proximity card system's users. The sanitization process substituted the original proximity card number with a random number, above the value 100, which is in no way linked to the identity of the user. The process did not modify the underlying relationship between a user and their data records. That is, the same random number was used for the same proximity card every time. It is not possible to derive the original user from the new proximity card number as data which personally identifies a user has been excluded from the data set. Hence, it is not possible to determine which real world user a data record is associated with, although it may be possible to determine the group a user belongs to.

V. CONCLUSION

The data set is a record of user activity within a proximity card system. The data set characterizes the behaviour of users within the system as a proximity card is a surrogate for an entity. This data would be useful in analyzing the behaviour of users within this RFID system.
